

TEMPLAR SPECIAL RULES

Special Locations

The Templar is particularly upright, and devoted toward serving his Deity. Therefore, he will not visit the Alehouse (lest he give in to vices). He will also avoid the Alchemist and the Gambling House, lest he be consumed by greed.

At the Temple, he may choose to make a special offering of any amount of gold to his Deity, rather than (or in addition to) making the standard 50 gold sacrifice. The amount of gold offered in this manner is immediately translated into "experience points", though no other benefit is gained. These "experience points" should be recorded. They may be spent in the same way as gold toward gaining Battle-Levels, but may not be used for anything else. The special advantage of "experience points" is that they cannot be lost either, an important consideration in light of the various Hazards and Events which part Warriors from their hard-earned gold.

If the Templar should choose to make a 50 gold sacrifice and pray for a blessing, he may roll a second die for the result. If the results double, then the effect may be used twice in the upcoming adventure. (e.g., if the Templar should roll 6 twice, then he gets to roll the extra 1D6 damage for any two attacks in the upcoming adventure, rather than just one.)

The Templar also gets to roll a second 1D6 at the Chapel Hazard during travel as well.

Templars and Equipment

The Templar may use any piece of equipment or magical item usable by the Barbarian.

Code of Chivalry

The Templar must be particularly devout and upright in his actions. He should seek to protect the innocent, and to assist the weak. He most certainly should not attack the defenseless, or rob the poor. If you are running a moderated game with a GM, the GM is completely justified to take away some or all of the Templar's benefits should he behave in an unheroic manner, until he can redress whatever grievances others have against him. Since this puts a special burden upon the actions of the Templar, the GM might also be justified to give him an occasional bit of Divine intervention as well if he is particularly upright and selfless.
